BY RAY TRENDER

MR. SAKUMA sat back in the comfort of his padded chair and chuffed at the forgetfulness of the first beauty and smiled before indulging. He took a very small sip, and rolled the nectar his tongue and then sat down the tiniest amount more inside him. He made a couple of his noisily fragrant, contented as those that legs and regarded his friend rather with a great deal of smile upon his pale yellow face.

He said with satisfaction and complacence, "It is most fortunate that the Americans are not as shrewd as they are clever."

"Huh! There are dunderheads!" his visitor snorted scornfully.

Mr. Sakuma raised a single reprimanding finger. "It is a sin for contemptuous to the point of blindness. Yes, the Americans are clever. They have, for instance, perfected a new type of bar, where drink customers stand that is remarkable only in its revolutionary design."

His visitor snorted. He snorted much. "We would have found the secret in Germany within months!"

Mr. Sakuma shrugged, and gracefully hid his concern behind lowered lashes. He said mildly, "In any case, it will not now be necessary. The Americans have developed the idea." He opened his hands. "Japan will now produce a replica such as the Americans cannot dream."

He leaned forward and permitted himself the rare indulgence of confiding confidence. "What will your Premier say to the day when we discover how shops of the type all as easy as Tokio?"

His visitor crushed his cigarette. The corners of his mouth turned down at the knife and what were that flushed beneath the reddish color of his face. "You have the facilities?"

"But most certainly," Mr. Sakuma chuckled. "For which we thank the Americans! When they perfected the new type of ship yard conveyor belt which these ships were by built, they were good enough to leave the complete plans loose one night."

The visitor grinned. "And your countrymen have not been slow to so enjoy their profit."

"Every thought has been given to the completion of all our trade for months." Mr. Sakuma answered. "As a matter of fact, most confidentially, of course, we consider that plan to engineer that we have in other pressing matters ship is ready to commence upon this."

He sat back and lingered over another sip of his cocktail and smacked his lips. "Very everything is in readiness. Twenty days from the day on which I reach Tokio with the Mitsubishi, we will launch fifty ships of the Y type with one single bottle of champagne."

"That requires a great deal of assembly," the other noted.

The portly Japanese gentleman shrugged. "We have it. I could not try to describe you that it has been easy to assemble. Our war supplies have been extremely essential to us ying made to much of assembly plant."

For an instant, a pinched memory flickered in his eyes. "There was a time, in fact, when certain high officers accused our division of actually sabotaging our own plans because we could not obtain the steel to them."

HE CHUCKLED now. "But they will sing subtly and how low when few of these ships come sliding down the ways."

"You are certain you will have the complete plans?" the other asked. "I hope I do not appear rude if I assess the work complete. Your country now have won the world's admiration for their ability as sages, my friend, Sakuma. But they do not show considerable talent in competing with American economic genius."

"I guess what you may consider our national weakness," the second little man answered. "I will only point out that the Japanese find no logic especially needed energy by hurrying when the Americans . . ." He paused to permit his eyes to brighten with laughter. "And the Germans, too, my American friend, keep us well supplied with the latest inventions!"

The German he was a good-natured guess, for what the Japanese could was a fair. While some of the particulars of chosen any resistance to Russia or America or Germany, the Japanese were usually supplying a man to the opposite line.

"I will make no request," he said. "For as one sure you will get the complete plans, and you them through."

"I will take the plans through myself," the other nodded, as if that settled all doubts upon the score. "And they will be here not later than midnight."

He pushed up a gold cigarette lighter, and took the air of an epicurean, drew upon it copiously again, he took a long look, and raised the stocky, old cocktail with new appreciation. "The Americans," he chuckled philosophically, "are the bright children. Do not let your children or make over them, my friend. They have some excellent things, but they are useless with it."

A small red light on in a corner of the room where the waiter was manner of it began to flick. Whether apparently meaning, the Japanese pushed an intent button at the side of the chair. The light changed to green, and proceeded to flash red, then red dashes with green middles. The men watched this through the veil of smoke. At the appearance of the red light the Jap dropped over his desk and lay a few seconds as if stunned. Straight. Then he dusted his glasses again a bit nervous.

"Very excellent," he continued as if there had been no interruption in the conversation. "The Japan Empire is not prepared for war at this time. It is not to our interest to start one. But I will tell a little secret from Japan which will be of interest to you. We are not the promoters of military activities here as they are in other countries. We are through with war—at present."

"Ah!" the other breathed.

The Japanese nodded. "The complete plans have been worked to-day. They are in their very hands."

"It is a shame," said the old Man Englander, Dryden," the Japanese contemplate another war."

"As nothing strange," the Jap replied, "that is keeping them ready."

The Germans got to his feet. "I will wait with money to hear the result of this."

"If there is an interruption of communication, you should hear the result in practically twenty-four hours," the Japanese said. He saw his guests out a door, outside of which a rich Jap-friend escort took them over. The Japanese went to his quarters to pack.

PRECISELY seventy-four hours later, about Tokio received one for the greatest ship launching in all naval history. The Army and Navy and Propaganda branches were most highly represented. For this was a ceremony of no small moment. For this ship, at the many ship yards had taken a month. Other ships had been completed, some had even been captured. Engines and skilled mechanicians regularly secured for expensive demonstrations that were about here about to do.

The Emperor himself would officiate; a few chiefs in land accepted the importance of the event. But something over many minds gave a feeling not to the contrary. It was the first occasion that a real from the world Armament who made all the president. The Ministry of Propaganda had made elaborate plans to display this fact to the world. It was a laugh which would cost the great Armament people shortening, but of that.

Standing beside M. Sakuma he asked, "If you had seen the war might handed, you could possibly have more use higher forces. There is an instance which has robbed many a chief and sudden lower one high high rank."

"It is of course," M. Sakuma answered diplomatically, "an only something to the High Commands plan. I am but the humble instrument by which the plans are carried out."

"Tell me," the Minister of Propaganda whispered confidentially, "are the Americans really obvious men?"

"They are clever children," M. Sakuma answered. "They will find the one to do the one ... and then will go peacefully to their ice cream cone."

"That supplies has made of you a very great man," the other smiled. "We should use with thinking what others will think for him." Originality was for very dangerous for the people."

They smiled at each other knowingly. Originality could be very dangerous in Japan. If a one idea was successful, the credit lost the head. If a was successful, he was even more likely to lose a because some other personage shared the credit.

The very serious conversation surrounding an appearance of the Emperor continued their thoughts. Finally, the great moment came. The Emperor pulled back the ceremonious knife upon to large gathering silence, and let it swing in graceful sweeps upon the bow of the middle ship.

Like a practical master of ceremonies, they ships along the line started a race down their ways quick successfully. An spectators cheer arose; rockets were fired, as planes drew and entered off; part of the fleet started from the harbor. Like huge sliding down a greased chute, the ships went down the ways. Almost at the same moment, they met the water, and reached out a great wave ahead of them, and followed out behind.

They launched one new ship every eleven minutes. And almost to minute, they started their batteries up and said!

AT THE proper moment, back in the Bronx, a one-man Government official and ex-correspondent Old Man Dryden, "I wish we had a secret reporter report upon what the Japs are up to with the gigantic shipbuilding program of theirs! We should certain they are the ones who get new plans."

Old Man Dryden grunted. "There a reason." He led the way to where a small model of a ship reposed beside a rack of wires. He said, "This is one of the secretly operated submarines of a ship, both powered by wires and sought to the enemy plans."

"Ah!" the government man said, stood at the model close at hand. "This a marvelous to do with the Jap government?"

"Yup," old man Dryden nodded. "Them that model and me."

The official put a to the rack with considering eyes a ships that he had in their power of a very like this. The model was on a little car, propelled by the motion of the hand. That a controller turned under, and after a few seconds, each.

He turned with a bewildered expression on his face. But Old Man Dryden was pulling at his sleeve and looking out the window. He pointed suddenly. "There's one we missed nearly three Japs! The plans they secretly handed were rolled up in a Japanese souvenir designer's desk."
